

Biography

Andre Hui

The National Archives of Singapore

Andre Hui, an archivist at the Records Management Department of the National Archives of Singapore, was born and has lived just under three-quarters of his life in Singapore. He spent some of his childhood in Yemen and split his college years between the US, the UK, and Singapore. He grew up loving reading and computer gaming, and currently wishes that he did more reading as opposed to computer gaming.

At work, he appraises government records for transfer to the archives, helps to project manage a whole-of-government records management audit, and likes to tinker with process improvement and datafication initiatives.

Outside of work, he's part of a board games start-up as its producer and game designer, is currently picking up the bass guitar as part of his church's worship band, and, in the opinion of some of his friends, knows far too much about data and metadata given his academic background.
